our readers an abstract. But the plain mote were so elegant that rhetoric would only spall them. The culprits, both negroes, were confined in the same call, in a little four-room jall, and the gallows upon which they were to vindicate the majesty of the law was erected in a orner or an inclosure surrounding the building. When all was in readiness, the sheriff waited upon his prisoners, and requested them to come out and be hanged. Just here there was an unfortu-nate hitch in the arrangements. The prisoners refused to come. Somebody had prisoners refused to come. Someoday has given them an iron bar, and with this they stood at bay. They blocked the narrow entrance to the ceil, brandishing their weapon, filling the air with curses, shricks, prayers, threats and hymna, vowshries, preyers, threas and hymns, two ing to say the first man who crossed the threshold. The sheriff "reasoned with them" in vain. He begged them to come out and do things "decently and in order." He "didn't want any first," and preferred not to "mutilate" them. In fine, he put it to them, as men of taste, that it would be best to step out pesceably and have a nice, quiet funeral. If he had been their own father, he could not have urged the point with more tenderness; but, to quote the terse language of a Memphis reporter, the prisoners only "riled up." Hereupon "Mr. Manus said he would go in there and take out those prisoners. Mr. Manus dasppeared for a moment into the hidsous darkness, and et to "mutilate" them.
